Metabolic Scavenging: Techniques for the Identification and Identification of Bioactive Compounds in Fungi and Bacteria. During the last two decades, the interest in bioactive compounds from a broad range of fungal and bacterial species has led to the development of efficient and reliable methods for their identification. Sample preparation, analysis and detection techniques continue to evolve, aiming at a better understanding of microbial metabolisms and the detection of compounds that can be used in biotechnological applications. This review focuses on the biotechnological application of fungi and bacteria for the development of anti-infective therapeutics, protein hydrolysates and biopolymers. Despite the large number of compounds published in the last decade, the identification of the main components in the fermented products still presents a challenge for analytical chemists, biotechnologists and microbiologists. Quantitative change and activity of polyamine oxidase isoenzymes from rat hippocampus following intracerebroventricular infusion of polyamine analog, alpha-(p-fluorophenyl)-N-methyl-1, 4-butadien-1-amine. Infusion of the polyamine analog, alpha-(p-fluorophenyl)-N-methyl-1, 4-butadien-1-amine (p-FMP) into the rat third ventricle produced a dose-dependent decrease in the levels of spermidine and spermine in the rat hippocampus. The values for the dose level of 5 nmoles of p-FMP per rat per hour were significantly lower than those for other dosage levels of 0, 2, and 10 nmoles of p-FMP per rat per hour. On the other hand, the activity of polyamine oxidase (PAO), which was measured by the amount of ammonia produced from the oxidation of polyamines at pH 7.4, was elevated in rat hippocampus at 10 and 20 nmoles of p-FMP per rat per hour. The values for the dose level of 20 nmoles of p-FMP per rat per hour were significantly higher than those for the other dosage levels of 0, 2, and 5 nmoles of p-FMP per rat per hour. These results suggest that PAO isoenzymes were inhibited and enhanced in rat hippocampus, and that the total polyamines content in the hippocampus was depleted by the infusion of p-FMP. These enzymological changes were much more pronounced when the dosage level of p-FMP in the ventricle
